Dear Harold:

Your two letters came while I was away from home, but still I owe you 1000 apologies. I forwarded the one for Sally and tried to think of someone here who might be suitable to cooperate in your enquiry. I can't possibly take on anything extra myself being totally immersed in a very long and very difficult book job. The one possible candidate for your job that came to my mind is Marcué Pardinas, editor-publisher of the recently defunct left magazine ~~Máximo~~ Política. All the time that has elapsed has been spent in trying to obtain his address, in which I was frustrated at every turn. I had assumed that his old office address was no good but it has finally emerged that he still works out of there putting out an economic publication. The address is Bucareli 59, 2o Piso, Mexico DF. He knows fair English and is thoroughly acquainted with left circles here and also stands well with the Cuban embassy. I think he might take it on himself - undoubtedly he would be interested in what you are doing - but if he has no time he should be able to recommend someone else. I suggest that your friends write to him explaining exactly what is wanted. Should it be possible to have the letter translated into Spanish, that would help; if not, the matter should be explained as simply and clearly as possible.

Your problem is not easy to solve and I can think of no one else. I hardly ever go to the city these days and am pretty out of touch. I hope something may come of this and wish you the best of luck as always.

Sincerely yours,

Adelberto
